

A Foundation for Your Future

The foundation for your future career often begins with four categories. Fill in a few bullets in each area to help you think through potential career paths.

Your Interests	Your Strengths	The Needs of Your Community/World	Your Opportunities
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> → What do you enjoy doing? → What are your hobbies? What interests do you pursue or would like to pursue? 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> → What are your natural talents? → What do people say you are good at? 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> → What are the needs of people around you? → Are there needs in the world that your interests and strengths could help to meet? 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> → Do you have unique circumstances that you could capitalize on? → Not sure what to put here? That's ok, be on the lookout for what may come your way.
I enjoy art, math, science, history, and political science classes. I also like sports, reading books, going to church, traveling, the outdoors, and meeting new people. I considered pursuing architecture and engineering degrees, but ended up majoring in Legal Studies in college.	I am creative, artistic, athletic, and confident, but also strong in math and science. I developed an interest in flying while attending the US Air Force Academy.	Because I lived in such a rural area where it took a long, long time to get anywhere, reliable transportation was extremely critical.	My desire to use the creative side of my brain in practical ways. In other words, architecture seemed like a good fit because I would not have viewed it simply as a job, but as more of a calling. I could be creative but see the fruit of my efforts. While I did not become an architect, I am able to meet the physical needs of people while also using the artistic side of my brain as a pilot. Flying is an art that requires quick reactions, critical thinking skills, and decisiveness.
